

Sanitary, political, and socioeconomic crisis in Latin America and the Caribbean: the contribution of population studies

Valparaíso (Chile), December 6-9, 2022

The Latin American Population Association (ALAP) invites its associate members, researchers, professors, students, public servants, civil and international organizations professionals, and those interested in population studies to participate at its X Congress.

Main theme

"Sanitary, political, and socioeconomic crisis in Latin America and the Caribbean: the contribution of population studies" is the theme selected by ALAP for the next Congress. This theme is an invitation to reflect on the region's current challenges. The pandemic of Covid-19 affected countries in different rhythms and levels. However, the political and economic crisis was already underway, so that the sanitary crisis intensified the deterioration of living conditions.

The pandemic of Covid-19 made us question the economic development and social protection models. It evidenced how deep the called care crisis can be and the fragility of gender equity in turbulent moments. It also showed us the need to protect sexual and reproductive rights in general. The advances experienced in recent decades concerning the education of girls, boys, adolescents, and young adults and the rights of migrants, the elderly, and vulnerable populations with disabilities or comorbidities have been put to the test. The medium and long-term impact of the pandemic will still require much research on all these fronts in the coming years.

The current moment shows our societies the value of access to public, timely, and quality data. Additionally, it is necessary that academics and scientists establish better communication with citizens and that public managers base their actions on reliable evidence. Doubtless, population scholars gather technical-scientific conditions to guide possible solutions to the crisis and present challenges.
